FUND COMMENTARY

The Federal Reserve (Fed), led by new Chairman Jerome Powell, raised the fed funds rate 0.25% in March. This is the sixth such increase since the Fed began tightening in December 2015. The Fed is responding to sustained economic growth, strong corporate earnings, and tentative signs of wage pressures. Treasury yields increased moderately across the board with the government yield curve flattening for the quarter. Municipal yields also rose across all maturities. However, the municipal yield curve steepened over the same period, particularly on the front end. Municipals benefited from a significant drop in new issuance versus last year's pace, but this benefit was countered by sizable selling by several institutional investors.

The Fund returned -0.95% for the quarter, compared to -1.07% for the Bloomberg Barclays California Intermediate Municipal Bond Index. We shortened interest rate exposure but kept duration close to neutral relative to the related index. To take advantage of the steeper yield curve, particularly with regards to the California market, we modestly extended the maturity of our positioning. We solidified the Fund's high credit quality in comparison to the Fund's benchmark. At quarter end, we held under 5% in A-rated securities and had no exposure to BBB-rated credits.

We will monitor the Fed for any changes in expectations for additional rate hikes this year. Also, we will keep a close eye on market-impacting comments coming from Washington D.C. officials. More specifically, we will monitor expected California supply for any opportunities presented by notable changes in issuance patterns.
